KeyMacro is a library, similar to the C library function `get_password_hash()`, which creates password hashes for common login methods. To use the library, no programming skills are required. Just include the included header file in your program, and call the function. The function returns a password hash string as a 32 character long string.

Installation

Compiling and Running the Application

DB Zipper needs only the SQLite libraries and a small installation script. You will need to download the following files:

- libsqlite3.dll from
- libsqlite3.a from
- Install.pl from

You also need the Windows environment variable `SQLITE3` set to point to the SQLite installation folder (typically `C:\SQLite`) In order to execute the `Install.pl` script (which is a simple Perl script), you will need a

Windows command line (cmd.exe). If you don't already have it, you can download a free version from: . You can then launch the Install.pl script from the Command line window. - Create the target database. - Open the target database with the same database application you were using to create the target database. - Compress the target database to a.dbz archive file. - Extract the tables you want from the compressed archive file to the target database. Additional Information You can choose to use the --overwrite option if the target database already contains tables and database structures that you do not want to overwrite. In that case you will need to choose the `--target-file` option when running the extractor utility. The option `--group-bypass` should be used if the target database structure has more than one table in the same schema. In that case, the `--target-file` option will still be needed in order to extract a single group of tables. Note that DB Zipper will overwrite files that are already present in the target database and replace them with the content of the `77a5ca646e`

---
