It is well known in the art that a content-addressable memory (CAM) device can be used to perform various logic operations which are conventionally performed using sequential circuits. A CAM device typically comprises a number of CAM arrays or CAM cells which can be connected to different inputs with CAM cells being connected to the different inputs being addressed for reading and writing. In operation, the contents of the CAM cells are scanned in parallel and compared to the data which are presented to the CAM. If a match occurs, an indication is provided. If no match occurs, the data input to the device are stored in the CAM cells. One use for such a CAM device is in a cache memory 3da54e8ca3
